

House panel postpones Roger Stone's Russia testimony

Roger Stone won't be testifying later this month before a key House panel in its Russia investigation, according to the longtime Donald Trump confidante and his attorney.

Stone last month had publicized the House Intelligence Committee's plan for a closed-door session July 24 to ask about his communications during the 2016 presidential campaign with Moscow-linked hackers and WikiLeaks, which had published personal emails stolen from Hillary Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta.

But Stone's attorney, Robert Buschel, told POLITICO that a House GOP staffer called Thursday to explain there'd been an indefinite delay on the hearing.
